Open Situation Room

New tools of citizens' diplomacy to find solutions in Syria
(Part 2: Implementation)

A situation room is a place where government officials gather in times of crisis to collect information and coordinate activities. Inspired by this example, it is a location designed for debate and discussion, rather than for command and control. It is an atelier politique, an information centre and a meeting place for decision makers, artists, students, analysts and journalists.

The Open Situation Room is based on the results of the Diplohack. Projects will be further developed with support of the table experts and guests.

Peer-to-peer Open Space

Each GDL member brings unique diplomatic insights and perspectives to Berlin. We would like to encourage the members to share them with the other participants by hosting a "project development" or a "teaching a diplomatic skill" session.

Members can either present a project they currently work on or an idea they developed during the Lab, or propose to host a 45min interactive session or discussion round. The other members choose the sessions they are most interested in.

Idea: In a more complex world, diplomacy occurs both inside and outside of formal diplomatic circles. How to recognize weaknesses and strengths of different actors and to build synergies among them, allowing regulation without falling into the fallacy of control, is key for effective policy making.

Explore existing innovative examples of international cooperation from different topic areas (trade, humanitarian, environmental, security issues) and across different groups (national, local governments, business associations, foundations, and grass roots groups) and identify the instruments, processes and skills that make their cooperation a success.

In short: What can traditional diplomats and other international actors learn from each other? How can they cooperate towards mutually desirable outcomes?
